

WHAT IS MAN (PART IV)

The human body would be an impossibility if left to natural selection. The design of the body demands a designer. It is illogical to think otherwise. To continue to believe what is illogical concern the origin of man is to condemn oneself. If the universe could not exist without a designer, the human body requires it more. Modern medicine cries out for design when it comes to the body. Geoffrey Simmons points out, "The interior of the human body is as much busier place than New York City, Tokyo, and Bombay combined. Ten to seventy-five trillion cells participate in more than a quadrillion purposeful chemical interactions each day that help us walk, breathe, think, sleep, procreate, see, hear, smell, feel, digest food, eliminate waste, write, read, talk make red cells, remove dead cells, fight infections, behave, misbehave, absorb nutrients, transport oxygen, eliminate carbon dioxide, maintain balance, carry on dialogue, understand instructions, argue, and make complex decisions, just to name a few common activities. In addition, each of these processes has dozens – and sometimes hundreds – of smaller, interacting steps, checks, counterchecks, balances, and regulatory mechanisms." Darwin had no knowledge of any of these mechanisms. We could conceivably let Darwin off the hook, but not the medical profession and philosophical evolutionists that know better today. I'm not even getting into transitional forms which have grossly failed Darwin's theory of natural selection. I am saying that to understand the design of the human body and continue to taut a "theory" that ignores it is insanity. Paul was right when he wrote, "they...became futile in their thoughts, and their foolish hearts were darkened. Professing to be wise, they became fools" (Romans 1:21-22). Man's pursuit to explain man without God has led to a complete breakdown of their hearts and minds so they no longer recognize truth when it is as plain as handwriting on the wall.
